

Satellite radio has been a godsend in upper Vermont, as I travel a lot, and no other station (or groups of stations) stays with me. I listen to it at home in my office while I work as well, but this doesn't mean I listen to less commercial radio- it simple means the radio is on more of the time. Like cable TV, satellite radio expands my choices and lets me focus on what interests me... I gladly pay a fee for this wider horizon. If regulations limit the scope of XM broadcasting, we might as well limit NPR, stop printing local and special interest publications, and all just subscribe to USA today. Variety of choice and competition is how we grow. Eliminating choice is how we stagnate.
